

documentation can be the backbone to a project's success.

A project manager is frequently a customer representative and has to determine and apply the exact requirements of the client, based on knowledge of the establishment they're representing. The capability to acclimatize to the internal procedures of the constricting party, and to form close links with the nominated representatives, is essential insuring that the crucial issues of cost, time, and quality and over all, satisfaction, can be realized.