

Importance of Human Rights

William Edwards*

Department of Political Science, University of Bristol, United Kingdom

*Corresponding author. E-mail: williamedwards@gmail.com

Received 10 December 2021; Accepted 24 December, 2021; Published 31 December 2021

COMMENTARY

Human rights are important because no one should be harassed or discriminated against, and because everyone should have the opportunity to develop their skills. Unfortunately, many people around the world do not have these basic rights and freedoms. Any crime against humanity can be a violation of human rights, including murder, torture, forced eviction, imprisonment, racism, or any other crime that targets human dignity. As Human Rights Watch states: Every day, in homes, schools, on the streets, and in the workplace, women, men, girls, and boys are being exploited and exploited because of their differences. Rights are never given to people by their governments. The goals of democracy, equality, and justice are rights themselves. These rights are the foundation of all democracy, and governments that ignore, violate, or violate human rights are not democratic. Human rights abuses Human rights abuses can happen in many ways.

The concept of human rights allows people to speak out in the face of abuse and corruption. That is why certain rights such as the right to freedom of association are important because there is no such thing as a perfect society. The concept of human rights empowers people and tells them that they deserve dignity in society, regardless of the government or the place where they work. If they don't get it, they can get up. Human rights are the basic moral values in relation to certain issues that are considered important around the world. When you are born as a human being, the world has set a code of conduct for you to obey. These values are called human rights. It is believed that they are available worldwide because all countries have signed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights agreeing with them. Human rights are a set of principles related to equality and fairness. They recognize our free will in our lives and develop our skills as human beings. It is about living a life free from fear, harassment or discrimination. Human rights can be broadly defined as the basic human rights that people from all over the world agree on. These include the right to life, the right to a fair trial, freedom from torture and other inhumane treatment, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and the right to health, education and an adequate standard of living. These human rights are the same for all people everywhere - men and women, young and old, rich and poor, regardless of our background, where we live, what we think or what we believe. This is what makes human rights 'universal'. Human rights can be defined as the basic human rights that everyone has, just because you are a human being. Human rights belong to a person or a group of people simply because they are human, or because they are a natural human danger, or because they are necessary for a just society. Whatever their justification, human rights refer to the advancement of values or abilities which are thought to promote human institution or to protect the interests of the individual and to be proclaimed as universal, in some way equally sought after by all, both present and future.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

The author has no area of interest.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

None.